As the scaling down of semiconductor devices has progressed, a conventional SiO₂ film formed from a conventional SiO₂ chemical vapor deposition (CVD) method has failed to meet a critical thickness required for a gate dielectric layer in order to have high reliability. Thus, an attention is recently focused on a high dielectric constant (high-k) film formed by sputtering for application to a gate dielectric layer. In the case of applying such a high-k film to a gate dielectric layer, however, it is required to suppress an increase in a leakage current. Thus, a technique of introducing nitrogen into a high-k film as a donor is proposed (see, e.g., JP-A-2007-159384 (the term "JP-A" as used herein means an "unexamined published Japanese patent application"). Nitrogen, which is a donor, is easily trapped by electrons injected from a channel, and thus the leakage current is reduced. In the wake of the recent pass-fail stumbles at Princeton and Stanford, many people have asked me whether it is safe for students to take "realistic" philosophy courses. This question, "realistic" philosophy, as I understand it, refers to the practice of writing, say, syllabus and assignment notes for a "liberal" philosophy course where the goal is to lead students to a belief in the conclusion that anything goes in philosophy. This is done by teaching introductory courses as though the central philosophical concepts - due to the nature of the course description - are not much of a philosophical issue at all. On top of that, the instructor tends to be merely a skilled teacher whose goal is to get the students through the course with no questions (i.e., questions to be answered by the teacher). Rather than going to the trouble of trying to disentangle "realistic" philosophy from philosophy, I suggest that we ask whether the two can be clearly distinguished. And to see how we can distinguish them, we need to make clear what philosophy consists of. Philosophy, I will suggest, is the activity of analyzing the structures of language - the structures of speech and writing - that lead us to think that what we say or write is true. A philosophical activity is the process of noticing some common structure present in a number of assertions, and then figuring out where this structure is in language. We do this in two ways. First we look at the natural language we use to state ide v. Miller, 605 So. 2d 1093, 1096 (Miss. 1992), the Mississippi Supreme Court stated: [W]e do not believe it is unreasonable to apply the purposeful act language of the [UCCJEA] to situations where the custodial parent initiates a relocation of a child without the noncustodial parent's consent and thereby leaves the custodial parent in a position to cause extreme emotional distress to the noncustodial parent. (Citing Iowa Code Ann. § 598.21, comment (1997)). The Alabama Supreme Court adopted the reasoning of the Iowa Supreme Court in holding that the UCCJEA applied in a relocation case where the father began considering the move after his wife had told him that the move was intended. Williams v. Williams, 623 So. 2d 342 (Ala. 1993). [3] The court did not err in admitting evidence pertaining to the relocation or the reason for the move. The step-sister testified that the move was "about Kevin and Mickey going to school and Mickey and Jessie going to school." The mother testified that at the time of the hearing the child was not yet in school and that her purpose in moving was to be with her children. The daughter also testified that the reason for the move was to go to school. Moreover, evidence of the mother's motives is relevant to the question of her credibility. Evidence of her motives may be introduced under the theory of rebuttal of an evidence claim. See AS 12.45.020(a)(1) and AS 12.45.040(a).
