It's a huge project: on average, a full version of Photoshop takes more than an hour to boot up, as compared to just under 4 seconds for Elements. Elements is a "half-way house" between Elements and

Photoshop. For photos and vectors (non-Raster) graphics, it's the better tool. For Raster photos and videos, it's not the best option. Elements is built on the same architecture as Photoshop: it has the same features, but only half of the number of options. This can mean that it's faster and more responsive than its big brother, and it is one of the best and most popular free photo editors out there. 10 Important Things

Q: Passing objects in JS functions I am designing a program in which a user enters a name in the GUI and then is taken to a page on the server side where the user image is retrieved. I have stored the user image in an object, and in another object I am storing the data of the users username and the name of the person's image. What I want to do is save the user's name in a var that is already defined, and then the program will pass that name on to the server side where the user's image is saved. Here is an example of what I'm talking about:

var userName = $.trim(getName()); var
userImage = $.trim(getImageData()); $.ajax({ type: "GET", url: "URL_TO_SERVER_FUNCTION", data: { name:
userName, image: userImage },

success: function (data) { //If the user image is successfully retrieved from the server //Show the user's image on the page } }); One of my problems is that when I use $.ajax it seems like everything is passed as a variable. And I can't use the var userName to pass it to the server without it losing its value. How can I go about doing this? Thanks, Tom

A: To be safe you can do something like this: var userName, userImage;

$.ajax({ type: "GET", url: "URL_T
O_SERVER_FUNCTION",
