The objective of this study was to assess the patients' knowledge of their health and of their physicians with a questionnaire. The Patient Assessment of Rheumatology and Rheumatology Knowledge guestionnaire was administered to 140 patients with rheumatic diseases in eight outpatient clinics. Mean knowledge scores were significantly higher for patients with rheumatoid arthritis than for patients with fibromyalgia or ankylosing spondylitis. In univariate analyses, knowledge was associated with age, gender, educational level, type of profession, and type of disease, but not with rheumatologist specialization or involvement in a rheumatoid arthritis patient association. In multiple regression analysis, education level and involvement in a patient association remained associated with knowledge. Patients' knowledge of their health and of their rheumatologist significantly increased during an 8-month followup period. This study provides evidence for the benefit of patient e79caf774b
